Thank you, Chairman. Excellencies, distinguished delegates.

More than fifty years ago, the late King Faisal bin Abdulaziz laid a visionary foundation for our nation, stating:
"We want this Kingdom, now and fifty years from now, to be a source of enlightenment for humanity and peace... building its future on firm foundations of faith and beneficial modern knowledge, and excellence in industry and technology."

Today, as a young Saudi and a representative of civil society, and in reviewing Saudi Arabia's Voluntary National Review alongside my colleagues, one message was clear: we are not only witnessing this transformation; we are contributing to it.

Across the Kingdom, young people, volunteers, and nonprofit organizations are active partners in strengthening communities and advancing national development.

The nonprofit sector's contribution to GDP has grown significantly from 0.2% to 1.4%. This progress provides strong momentum as we continue advancing toward the Vision 2030 ambition of 5%.

My question to Your Excellency is:
How can we work together to strengthen the measurement and visibility of youth and nonprofit-sector contributions, support promising initiatives to scale, and ensure that their impact is fully reflected in Saudi Arabia's future development and progress toward the 5% ambition?